Supporting Children with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD) in Primary Schools (Online)

Overview:

This two-hour, online training will be delivered by an Educational Psychologist and will explore what ADHD is and how the traits associated with the diagnosis impact children in primary school. It aims to dispel common myths by exploring how the condition is presented in popular media and developing staff understanding through evidence-based information about the condition. This training will provide staff with practical, evidence-based, inclusive strategies which they can use in their classrooms when supporting children who have ADHD. The training will include discussion time and support so that staff feel able to make practical plans for implementation of the strategies presented within their own practice.

Who is it for?

This course is suitable for SENCOs, class teachers and teaching assistants in mainstream primary schools.

Outcomes:

- For staff to develop their understanding of what ADHD is and recognise how the condition might impact children in their school.

- For staff to learn about evidence-based strategies to support pupils who have ADHD and to feel confident in their ability to implement these in their classroom and wider school.
